

Automobiles must include systems which aid in creating ride sharing opportunities more dynamically. Americans prize independence, but are willing to accept temporary inconvenience for an equivalent short-term return. Planning ahead is much less realistic for the average commuter than being sidetracked for a random but bounded delay in exchange for some useful reward (monetary, service, or privilege).