

I support changing the archaic "age 60 rule" to something more compatible with modern lifestyles. People today are living longer, healthier, and more usefull lives. It makes no sense to me to force them to retire at the peak of their expertise and experience while others much older continue to make important contributions in government, law, and business. There are a number of safeguards in place in aviation in the event of failing health. I feel strongly that the retirement age should be raised to 65 for pilots in good health.
