

I want to thank the FAA for introducing the proposed rule that will require airlines to document and list incidents involving live pets aboard their flights. I fly with my dog occasionally and I know that I would benefit a great deal by being able to choose the "safest" airline for her if I could view a list of some sort. Our pets are just as important as our children (for some of us) and they deserve the right to be safe and secure as we are in the passenger hold of the plane. Airlines that have gone the extra mile to ensure this safety should be recognized and other airlines that have not, should also be listed. This will give the general public the choice of what airline to take their pet on. Also...I would like to ask that other animals, besides just pets, be included on the rule. Zoo and lab animals are living, breathing creatures too, and they deserve to be as safe and secure as possible along with the family pets that are along side of them in the cargo hold.
