

I live in the village of Lineville, Iowa. There are no state or federal maintained highways which the trains cross, only village street which some have automated crossing barricades.

It is common knowledge within the health care industry that as we age we lose the ability to hear high pitch sounds. However, almost every night I am awakened by the trains which blow the whistle, without letting up, all the way through town. It is bad enough that due to the weight of some, my computer vibrates, and I live across a street from the railroad. I do not feel that it is necessary for trains to blow their whistles at miscellaneous crossings. I was prompted to write this comment as the result of a train a few minutes ago which did the aforementioned, I'm sure those who attend late church had their sermons interrupted.

Should you need additional information, or if I may be of further service, please advise me.

Respectfully submitted,
Kate Lyman

P.S. Another train just went by blowing his whistle all the way through the village.
