

Amtrak's recent financial difficulties have been caused not by mismanagement of the system, but by the artificially imposed congressional mandate of "financial self-sufficiency". There isn't a successful railway system in the world that operates without some level of government subsidy. Passenger rail operations should be subsidized in the United States. Among other things, an expanded passenger rail system would alleviate the burden on the air travel system.