

Reacting to terror and the threat of war by removing basic rights of due process for citizens is the opposite of what I've always believed America is all about. I might support a rule that provided for suspension of airman privileges at the behest of TSA or other legitimate security agency, as long as due process, including the right to appeal the action, remained in place. I can see no justification for a rule that specifically removes the right of appeal, and frankly fear we are on the slippery slope toward a police state.
