Additionally, suggested language for answering question number 15 and 16 are printed below. Please express these comments in your own words.

15. To benefit my small business and alleviate the shortage of CDL drivers faced by beer wholesalers and the small business community at large, drivers need not necessarily ever graduate to a full, unrestricted CDL. If CDLs are restricted by age of driver, weight of vehicle, length of vehicle, terrain, distance driven, conditions, time of day and other factors, drivers may not need to ever graduate to a full and unrestricted CDL to be of maximum benefit to a beer wholesaler or other small business engaged in local delivery. I urge the DOT to consider implementing a system of graduated licensing in which each level of the GCDL can be considered a CDL in its entirety and need not necessarily be considered only a stepping-stone to the unrestricted CDL.

16. A GCDL could actually result in cost savings for beer wholesalers and small business, in general. Beer wholesalers bear the financial burden of training CDL drivers, and are happy to do so. However, when recently certified CDL drivers are "cherry picked" from my company to become long haul, over the road drivers, I am left to begin the process all over again at a significant expense. If my business could employ a driver who had mastered a set of skills that allowed him to safely operate a commercial vehicle for delivering our product, without a full, unrestricted CDL, that would result in a cost savings for my business. These savings could then be used for greater job creation, warehouse improvement, greater retail execution and a host of other pro-growth economic initiatives.
