

For carriers who are willing to have a "no hazmat operations" policy inserted into their op specs, those carriers should only be required to train to the level required for their crews to recognize hazmat for the purpose of preventing it from being loaded on that company's aircraft. Any additional training creates an unnecessary burden since I don't believe that there is any data supporting the position that a lack of additional training has caused any accidents.