

So far, the general aviation community has seen little solid evidence that such regulation would provide substantial increases in safety for the general populace. Further, the exemption provided for sightseeing flights stands as one of the few opportunities for entrepreneurship remaining in the aviation industry. Requiring these business to become certificated 135 operators will do nothing more than destroy a good-natured, harmless business.