

I respectfully request that you would reconsider the removal of placards on railcars. Living in a petrochemical community, where main industry depends on railcar shipments makes residents acutely aware of the importance of the early detection of any kind of accident that may occur with hazardous materials. Without that early detection many lives will be at stake including first responders. If critical information is removed from the use of the those responding, then haven't we accomplished what terrorist may have failed to do? They don't have to do anything, they just wait for our own people to do it to themselves. Please reconsider.
